Basel Gold Day: How to obtain clean gold – The consumer perspective

It is no secret that the provenance of gold is in many cases highly problematic. Human rights are frequently violated in mining. Industrial standards have been written, but their implementation remains uncertain. Refineries and downstream entities often cannot trace the gold back to its origin, especially where multiple small-scale mines are at the origin of the supply chain. However, industrial mining also has its problems (in particular licenses obtained through corruption, land grabbing, toxic waste, conflict with local communities).

Increasingly, consumers are demanding "clean" gold. They don't want to run the risk that the gold for their wedding ring, for example, has been mined by children. How can we, after years of talk, finally secure a clean supply chain? And how do we cope with the insufficient supply of reliably mined gold?

This workshop deliberately does not focus on either large-scale mining or on artisanal and small-scale mining – its goal is to explore how to improve the supply of sound gold. Its main focus is the consumer interest.

Its location in Basel is no coincidence. Basel hosts the worldwide jewellery and watchmaking fair Baselworld, it is the place where the "central bank of central banks" – the Bank for International Settlements – has its head office. It is also the home of the Basel Institute on Governance, an institution specialised in international regulation.
